WORCESTER, MA – March 2, 2016 – The Worcester Art Museum (WAM) today announced the acquisition of Cornelis van Haarlem's Paris and Oenone (1616), an important example of Dutch Golden Age painting, given to the Museum by New York collector Hester Diamond. The painting joins two others by Cornelis van Haarlem in WAM's collection—The Wedding of Peleus and Thetis (1593) and Venus and Cupid (1602)—making the Museum's holdings of paintings by the artist the most comprehensive in the nation. The gift follows Ms. Diamond's 2013 landmark gift of Paolo Veronese's Venus Disarming Cupid (circa 1560), further enhancing the Museum's Old Masters collection.

Paris and Oenone is among a series of works Cornelis van Haarlem created during his lifetime that illustrate his fascination with love stories from ancient Greek and Roman mythology. The larger-than-life painting features Paris, the son of King Priam of Troy, as he courts Oenone, the daughter of the river god Cebren, by carving her name into a tree. The bucolic scene represents an important transition in the artist's stylistic evolution. While his early work was characterized by the highly refined and elegant Mannerist style that he helped develop, with intricate works done on paper, wood, and metal, Paris and Oenone represents the artist's newfound interest in the monumental. It captures a new engagement with large-scale canvases and classicizing subjects drawn from antiquity, as well as the change to a much more naturalistic, lush palette.

“Paris and Oenone represents a crucial chapter in the history of Dutch painting, and the trajectory of this pioneering artist's own career. This incredible gift, an excellent example of monumental history painting, adds tremendous dimension to our holdings of Dutch pictures and connects beautifully with Ms. Diamond's previous gift of work from the Italian Renaissance," said Matthias Waschek, C. Jean and Myles McDonough Director of the Worcester Art Museum. "We are truly grateful to Ms. Diamond for her continued generosity, and to her stepdaughter Rachel Kaminsky, who is a valued board member and has shown a tremendous commitment to enhancing the Museum's collections. We are thrilled to create a new installation that accentuates the large-scale nature of the painting and offer our visitors a more comprehensive view of art historical masterworks."

"In giving Venus Disarming Cupid to the Worcester Art Museum in 2013, I was pleased to have found an opportunity for this masterpiece to be embraced by its public and new custodians, enriching the collection as much as the experience of its visitors," said Ms. Diamond. "It's in the same vein that I am donating this beloved work by Cornelis van Haarlem. I look forward to seeing how the Museum incorporates the painting into their galleries to honor its significance and its potential to spark new ideas and connections."

Born in Haarlem, Netherlands in 1562, Cornelis Cornelisz van Haarlem was raised by the painter Pieter Pietersz, after his parents fled the city in 1568 when it was attacked by the Spanish army during the 80 Years' War. Between 1580 and 1581, he studied in Rouen, France, and Antwerp, before returning to Haarlem where he joined Hendrick Goltzius and Karel van Mander in forming their own Haarlem Academy. Together, these artists helped develop Dutch Mannerism, defined by their intricate compositions with twisted, elongated nudes in complex poses. He later abandoned this style, and began working in the Netherlandish realist tradition. His work shaped the style and what came to be known as the Dutch Golden Age period of painting.

In Paris and Oenone, the artist conveys the tale with both elegance and eroticism. The painting reflects recurring motifs in Cornelis van Haarlem's oeuvre, including such characters as the child and hound, which surround the figures, and Oenone's pose, which depicts her leaning on her elbow with her left hand raised towards the sky. The painting also exemplifies the dominant use of nude figures in the artist's work.
